Cheers! The World's Best Vineyard is from Argentina

Zuccardi Valle de Uco is the first winery to earn the accolade.

Gather round, raise a glass! Argentina's own Zuccardi Valle de Uco winery grabbed the top spot in the first-ever World's Best Vineyards awards, announced earlier this week.

The official list ranked 50 of the world's top wineries, with over 1,500 wineries receiving nominations. The World's Best Vineyards' Academy, comprised of nearly 500 wine tourism experts, went "beyond the wines" to assess the "whole experience" of each winery. There was no formal assessment criteria per se, but the Academy factored in the "restaurant, tour, ambiance, staff, view, price, reputation, accessibility [and] everything that makes a vineyard visit a valuable and rewarding experience."

But let's not forget who the real winner is. What gives the Zuccardi the edge to reach that coveted first place?

For starters, its location puts it ahead of the rest. Standing at 1,100m above sea level in the picturesque, mythical Valle de Uco in the south of Mendoza province, the winery lies at the foothills of the Andes, the area with the highest altitude. For grapes, high altitude is good news: it means a broad temperature range and lots of sunlight. And that steep mountain incline? It means that the grapes have even more direct contact with the sun, resulting in an expressive flavor profile and long-term complexity.

With operations overseen by winemaker Sebastián Zuccardi, the winery has been in operation since 1963. As a third-generation winemaker, Sebastián has taken over after his father retired a few years ago and developed the winery to include five distinct properties, each with a special edge in location. Zuccardi and his R&D team developed new farms and irrigation strategies to harness the best grapes you can get.

As for the winery, not only does it offer exquisite views of the mountains and surrounding landscape, but it is an architectural feat itself. The academy remarked on the three-story structure's ability to be "part of the landscape," blending in seamlessly with walls made of rocks from the Zuccardi's Piedra Infinita vineyard, and using water and sand from the Tunuyán River.

King Felipe and Queen Letizia of Spain conclude Argentina state visit

BRITTANI BARGER | 28TH MARCH 2019

King Felipe and Queen Letizia's state visit to Argentina began with a welcome at the presidential residence, Casa Rosada, hosted by President Mauricio Macri and his wife, First Lady Juliana Awada on Monday.

The welcome ceremony provided for discussions on the reforms taking place in Argentina and President Macri thanked the King and Queen for their visit which shows their support for what the President called a "moment of change" in his country.

The King also spoke of Spain's constant support for Argentina even in "difficult times" adding, "We are very aware of the situation that has gone through in economic terms, and we support all of its reform programmes that are underway."

Day two had the King attending a business breakfast meeting with Argentine and Spanish businessmen and President Macri. Next, he participated in a conference "Buenos Aires, Good Ideas" organised by Cotec. There he spoke about Argentina saying, "It is often said that Argentina is a country rich in natural resources, which is true; but it is also true, and certainly more important, to point out that it is a country rich in human resources."

The afternoon saw King Felipe and Queen Letizia meet the Spanish community in Argentina before the King held an audience with the Latin American Jewish Congress who presented him with the Shalom Prize. According to Casa Real, the prize is "an award that is granted as recognition to those people or organisations that stand out in their efforts in the construction of the peace."

In the evening, the King and Queen held a reception in honour of President Macri and First Lady Awada. This brought an end to the official state visit but not the end to the trip to Argentina as the royals had an engagement on Wednesday in another Argentine city.

On Wednesday, Their Majesties were in Córdoba to participate in the opening of the VIII International Congress of the Spanish Language (CILE). Casa Real has said the trip "serves to highlight and reinforce the historical bonds and the bilateral relations between both countries."
